

John I. Yellott House

The John I. Yellott House (Penn Hotel) played an important role in Towson both as a residential and commercial structure. Built in the early 1870's as a residence for the lawyer and newspaper editor John Israel Yellott, the brick structure was designed in the fashionable mansard style. The characteristic roof with its bracketed eaves and hood mouldings survived until 1977 and was the last of its type in central Towson.

Following its use as a private residence this fine brick building was enlarged and converted into a hotel in the early part of this century. Although it was no longer used as a hotel the restaurant known as the "Penn Hotel" continued to be a popular gathering place for those living and working in the county seat until its closing in 1975.

A subsequent renovation for another eating establishment was the final in a series of renovations that have left the old building virtually stripped of its original fabric.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

This report was written after the John I. Yellott House had received its most recent and most serious alteration. The report is based on notes and photographs taken just before, and during, demolition. Research shows that the building was originally an L-shaped two story brick residence with a mansard roof on the main block. John I. Yellott built this house as his residence in the early 1870's. Additions were made before 1898, and in the early part of this century the building received its first major alteration when it was converted into a hotel. More additions and alterations took place as it later became a popular restaurant in the 1950's, 60's, and early 70's. After a period of vacancy the building has again been renovated for use as a restaurant. Until this time, however, much original fabric had survived both in a visible and concealed state. The most recent renovation, however, has virtually demolished the original structure, leaving only the brick walls and stone foundation. The mansard roof was removed, the interior completely gutted and all floors, windows, doors, stairs and mouldings stripped.

In December of 1977, however, it was observed that:

Behind the modern facade of "Bernie Lee's Penn Hotel" exists the brick structure that was the residence of John I. Yellott. From opposite the street one can still see the mansard roof, bracketed eaves, hood moulds and palladian windows that gave the street facade of this house elegance. That portion of the building was five bays wide. The main block was one bay deep, and two stories plus the mansard in height. A two story wing projected along the western side of the house and constituted two long bays. The slate gable-end roof of this wing is still present beneath the second floor of the hotel-addition. By 1898 another two story brick wing was added to the east side producing a -shape with a small courtyard in between. This area too was eventually covered.

The main block of the original building contained many decorative features. These included a centrally located palladian window on the second story and bracketed eaves which ran around the mansard portion of the roof. When the entire building was made mansard-like in the 20th century the brackets, which were originally in the back or south facade, were removed and used to decorate the extended cornice of the west facade. The entire roof is covered with asbestos fishscale shingles which date from the hotel renovation. The original shingles were probably slate, like those found on the southwest wing. The original mansard roof had dormer-like 4/4 sash windows which were capped with hood-moulds. These ran three across and one deep.

The original plan provided for a central hall containing the entrance and stairs which was flanked by parlors. The west parlor would have lead into the kitchen wing. The 1890's addition made the east parlor two rooms deep as well.

Fireplaces were found on the south wall of the kitchen wing, the interior wall of the west parlor and the south wall of the southeast addition. The fireplace opening in the west parlor measured 36 inches across and 21 inches deep. It was 28 inches high with a brick jack-arch. The chimney itself is 54 inches wide. All of the rooms of the first floor appear to have had tall ceilings and well lighted rooms. The hall contained a windy switchback stairs (evidence suggests alterations and an original multi-landing stairs) with scrolled step-ends and two turned balusters per step.

Even the basement has seen alterations, however, it can be determined that the original house had a full uncoursed stone walled cellar. Vertically sawn joists can be seen and random width tongue-and-groove flooring above. A massive stone structure in a central location contains a small room (8'10" sq.) with walls that are 16" thick. It is perceived to be load-bearing. There are stone buttresses located elsewhere along the exterior walls. The walls of the basement rise c. 15" above the ground level.

There is some original fabric on the second floor. The spiraling stairs lead to a landing or central hall above that is lighted by the palladian window. The doors of the rooms in the main block have moulding, with this profile:

The stairs split at the third level to form landings on both the North and South sides. The third level of the main block is characteristic of a mansard with the outer walls at least (all four walls originally) being trapezoidal. In the early 20th century the mansard was extended to the South and a third level given to the two Southern wings. This area was divided into ten rooms which still have their metal numbers tacked on the door. The moulding of these rooms are quite plain as are the corner blocks. The doors are four-paneled and retain metal box-locks and porcelain knobs.

Alterations could be seen in the attic. The newer roof contains a ridge-pole into which the principal rafters are toe nailed with wire nails. (Later demolition revealed the South side of the original mansard and sheet metal roofing.)

In a crawlspace under the third story floor and between the two South wings it was observed that:

1. The east side of wall A and the West side of wall B were originally exposed. B was painted black.
2. Wall C once had brackets and has dark green bond.
3. Area (2) is covered by a slate gable end roof.
4. Remains of a dismantled chimney on the South end of (2).

The gutting of the exterior makes clear several points about the evolution of the Yellott House:

1. The L-shape seen in the 1877 Atlas appears to have been the original. Exposed brick walls and removal of 20th century additions shows a two story mansard roofed brick structure five bays wide and one deep with a two story projection to the rear that was two bays long and one in width. This was a kitchen wing and ran on the West side of the Building.

2. The addition which is evident by comparing 1877/1898 Atlases was a two story brick construction with a fireplace-chimney on the South wall. This projection ran parallel to the kitchen wing resulting in an enclosed courtyard c. 5' wide. (1898 Atlas is not quite accurate ie.:

Windows and exterior paint on both walls "A" and "B" are further evidence of this fact.

Paint shows variety of colors including cream, yellow, gray-green and pink. The courtyard was covered over at one point with a metal roof.

3. The second floor room of the kitchen wing shows evidence in the South wall of an A-frame roof, South chimney, and early 20th century enclosure.
4. The original plan had an interior centrally located chimney serving as a fireplace in the West parlor. No evidence of tap-in on either second or third floors.
5. The five bays of the first floor of the North facade were defined by a centrally located entrance flanked by tall windows. Framing set in brickwork suggests the possibility of French windows 9'high, 44" wide.
6. The brackets used to go around the entire building with a two foot dark green painted bond instead of wood panel.
7. A "pier" in the cellar is support for the # 1 chimney.
8. One of the demolition crew found 1870's newspapers in the walls of the Northwest room on the second floor. They were a Calvert Journal (May 2, 1874) and a Baltimore County Democrat (April 22, 1870.) John I. Yellott, the builder of this house, is printed as the editor with his office being #9 Smedley Row. Among those advertising are Dr. James H. Jarrett and Dr. George H. Carnes who as partners were "offering their services to citizens of Towsontown." Also advertising his legal services was John I. Yellott with that office being at #8 Smedley Row.
